Synopsis of Coal Mining Regulations.

COAL mining rights of the Dominion in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the Yukon territory, the North-west Territories and in a portion of the Province of British Columbia, may be leased for a term of twenty-one years at an annual rental of $1 an acre. Not more than 2,560 acres will be leased to one applicant.

Application for a lease must be made by the applicant in person to the Agent or Sub-Agent of the district in which the rights applied for are situated.

In surveying territory the land must be described by sections, or legal sub-divisions of sections, and in unsurveyed territory the tract applied for shall be staked out by the applicant himself.

Each application must be accompanied by a fee of $5 which shall be refunded if the rights applied for are not available, but not otherwise. A royalty shall be paid on the merchantable output of the mine at the rate of five cents per ton.

The person operating the mine shall furnish the Agent with sworn returns accounting for the full quantity of merchantable coal mined and pay the royalty thereon. If the coal mining rights are not being operated, such returns should be furnished at least once a year.

The lease will include the coal mining rights only, but the lessee may be permitted to purchase whatever available surface rights may be considered necessary for the working of the mine at the rate of $10.00 an acre.

For full information application should be made to the Secretary of the Department of the Interior, Ottawa, or to any Agent or Sub-Agent of Dominion Lands.

W. W. CORY,
Deputy Minister of the Interior.

DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND

Slowly, with that impassive expression that always sat on his handsome face on such occasions, Gerald led his wife to the hostess. He knew that every eye was fixed on them, but his calm serenity was undisturbed as if he were walking across the smoking-room of the club.

It was the first appearance of Gladys. She was but a schoolgirl a few weeks ago, but she showed no trace of nervousness or agitation. With the usual frank, half-smiling expression of confidence, she made her bow and shook the great lady by the hand, and not even Wilmot, whose eyes were fixed on her, could discern a single tremor of the red lips, or a single quiver in the beautiful eyes.

"Yes, she is beautiful," said the Countess of Fenchurch; "very beautiful! I heard of her in Paris, but they were very quiet, and went out very little. But who was she? I knew something of Lord Dashleigh—everybody does; but who is she?"

"The world will not care to ask that question, Lady Fenchurch," said an English earl, watching Gladys through his eye-glasses. "The world will be quite ready to receive her for what she is."

"If Lord Ganby is going to set the seal of his approval," said the countess, with a smile.

The old earl smiled.

"It does not need my seal," he said, simply; "Lady Dashleigh will carry everything before her."

"Look," said Lady Sauldgier; "his highness is being introduced. Yes, her success is accomplished. But who is that handsome man with the yellow hair standing between them He came in with them."

That is—yes, it is Wilmot," said Lord Ganby. "Came in with them?"

Lady Sauldgier laughed meaningly. She was the queen of scandal-mongers.

"Yes, they say that he goes with them everywhere. He is staying at the same hotel."

"Her brother, perhaps."

"No. I know all the Wilmots, and she is not one of them. And so Lord Dashleigh is chained at last! It is Una and the lion over again."

"But Una was a meek girl with golden hair, and they always paint her with a simper," objected Lord Ganby. "Lady Dashleigh is anything but a Una, and I cannot fancy a simper on that face."

"Magnificent jewels!" murmured the countess. "I never saw anything better than that set."

"It is nothing to the Dashleigh diamonds," said Lady Sauldgier, turning a bracelet on her arm. "I saw them on the former Lady Dashleigh only once. She never cared for diamonds. They are unapproachable—even by Miss Smith's."

It was very hot. The lights reflected on the Venetian mirrors, though beautiful to look at, were eminently conducive to headache. Gladys had received the introduction of fifty distinguished persons whose names she had mixed up in hopeless confusion. Gerald's impassive countenance was impassive still, but Gladys knew as surely as if he had groaned and thrown up his arms that he was bored to death. Wilmot, with his crushed hat in his hand, had gone the rounds with them, occasionally meeting and stopping to talk with an old friend. Arrivals were still announced, the thing grew oppressive and seemingly endless, but at last Gladys found herself in a quiet corner, just as if she had drifted there, and found at the same time that Gerald had been washed away by the tie, and that Wilmot was by her side instead.

"Oh," she said, below her breath, "are you here? I can understand now why Gerald hates this sort of thing, and clings like a dying man to his Times. It is a fearful ordeal."

He looked at her as she stood in her glorious beauty—glorious in its youth and freshness—and smiled.

"This is your first experience of this sort of thing "

"Yes, and I am trying to be delighted; but I can scarcely realize that this is the sort of thing we used to read about at school and long for. They used to say that I could give a special unction to descriptions and receptions, and make me read them; and we always went into ecstasies. And this is it! I was never so hot in my life, and never so much bored!"

"And yet you have gone through the ordeal triumphantly," he said, still looking at her with a strange smile. "I hear your name on every lip, and always with admiration—or envy."

Gladys smiled.

"Ought I to feel triumphant—happy? I felt happier yesterday, when we were at high mass at St. Peter's. What a farce is all this? Oh, here they come again," she broke off, as a wave surged in their direction. "Do you know what I am devoutly praying for at this moment?"

He shook his head.

"That none of these great people to whom I have been introduced will come up and begin talking to me I can't remember one from the other. Fancy addressing a German baron as a French count, or an Italian count as an Austrian duke! What would happen?"

"They are so courteous that each would pretend to be the man you mistook him for, just to save you embarrassment. But do you really want to get out of it for a little while?"

"That is your petitioner's most earnest prayer," said Gladys.

"Then come with me," he said. "I know a way down to the bottom of the staircase. You will find people sitting on the stairs, but there will be some air there, and you will get out of the glare of these million candles."

She put her hand on his arm, but as they moved, a crowd of people pressed upon them and forced them to stop. Just in front of them were a lady and gentleman—the lady Italian, the gentleman English. At the moment of the forced stoppage the gentleman was replying to a question of the lady.

"Lord Dashleigh?" he said. "Oh, yes, I know him well. Haven't seen him since his marriage. Been abroad here."

"Is it true that he was rather wild "

"Mad as a hatter. Town full of stories about him."

"All true "

Well, most of them. Nothing is quite true, you know. But he went the pace. I'm surprised he is married. There is a story of an escapade of his—"

Wilmot had been making violent but polite struggles to get his companion away, and at this point, by something like sheer force, he succeeded. He knew that she had heard every word, but he did not raise his eyes to her face until they were out in the little gallery that led to the hall; then he looked up and saw her face was white; but her eyes still bravely looked straight ahead unflinchingly.

"You are right," he said, almost savagely, "it is a confounded nuisance and an unmitigated bore; and no one but fools—ourselves excepted—would ever come to such places.

Gladys looked at him with a forced smile, and gradually the color returned to her face. They had reached the hall by this time. As he had prognosticated, the staircase was simply lined; the women fluttering their fans, the men leaning against the marble balustrade, and looking insufferably bored. Gladys drew a long breath and moved toward the door.

"It is cooler here," said Wilmot, looking at her with an enxious expression on his face. "It is a pity we should have to go back."

Gladys smild emphatic assent.

"I do not mean to go back," she said. "I shall stay here."

"Gerald will never find us," he said.

Gladys sighed, and the sigh appealed to him at once.

"Look here," he said, "if you don't mind my leaving you—. Oh, here's a man I know, and can leave you with."

"No," she said, grasping his arm, "do not. I don't want any more introductions. If you will go back and find Gerald and tell him that—"

"I unerstand," he said, as if her lightest word were a royal command to him. "Wait here and I will find him," and he led her to a quiet corner and disappeared.

A TRIBUTE TO C. B. FOSTER

Good Words for C. P. R. New Brunswick Man Who Has Made Success.

(Canadian Courier.)

Among the high officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway, whose duties is to look after the millions of passengers who travel on its thousands of trains and its fleet of 80 steamers, none is more popular than Charles Beverely Foster. He was recently made assistant passenger traffic manager and is now in line for promotion to one of the executive offices—than which there is no greater honor in the transportation world.

"Charlie" Foster, as he is familiarly known to hundreds of travelers all over the continent, is a New Brunswicker. He was born in Kingston, Kings county, in 1871. When twenty years of age he became a stenographer in the passenger department of the Canadian Pacific at St. John, and in a short twelve years rose to be district passenger agent at that point. In 1904 he was moved to Toronto, thence to Vancouver, and later to Winnipeg. Now he comes to the final resting place of the C. P. R.'s best men—the head office in Montreal.

Mr. Foster has a record of homes which quite outshines the best record of a bank clerk. He himself claims to have moved his household goods oftener than any other man in Canada except the man who moves to avoid paying rent. When he went to Winnipeg in 1910 he had difficulty in finding a house. After moving about several times, he finally settled in a beautiful home. One day he and his wife found themselves nicely settled with the blinds and curtains and screens all complete. They sat down and talked over the possibility of their enjoying it for a few years and they had misgivings. Next day he got a telegram to meet a high official in Chicago, and he and Mrs. Foster were suspicious. The expected happened—he got moving orders to Montreal.

Mr. Foster is a master of detail and a maker of friends. These are the outstanding characteristics which have carried him so fast up the ladder of success.

One way to avoid a quarrel is to be absent at the psychological moment.

USEFULNESS OF BIG EXHIBITIONS

International Shows Promote Agreement Rather Than Differences.

London, Aug. 4—In view of Britain's refusal to participate in the San Francisco Panama Exposition, it is of interest to note that the Right Hon. Sydney Buxton, President of the Board of Trade, made a speech Saturday at the Ghent Exposition, in which he said:

"These exhibitions, no doubt, are chiefly carried on with the desire of extending trade and business, but I say this: "It is not for business and trade merely that they should be held. I think that these exhibitions carry out a very great work even in themselves. The mere fact of bringing together various representatives of many nations, bringing their knowledge and undrstanding and appreciation, is in itself a great work from the international point of view. It assists to make them look to the good qualities in the other nations rather than their deficiencies, to promote agreement rather than difference. I am sure the national relations between the countries is greatly improved by these expositions."

Bathing suits should always be of very light material.

Red bandana handkerchiefs make excellent dusters.
